

New Ending

“Perseus, please. Do not kill him, just lock him in the bronze tower.” Danae pleaded. Perseus wanted to fulfill the destiny his mother had just told him.

“But mother, if we lock him in the tower, his warriors will wage war against us.” Replied Perseus. “If we kill him, it will over and his country will accept that we fulfilled the prophecy.”

“No, they will still wage war against us.” Said Danae.

But Perseus was already at sea with Andromeda and his mother. Perseus would basically decide what would happen to the three of them. He thought of his mother’s idea, not completely persuaded. He sat at the hull for the trip and only thought of what he would do.

When they arrived, Perseus was going to shoot Acrisius with an arrow. But as it turned out, he didn’t need to. Acrisius threw himself off the roof of his own palace as soon as he spotted Perseus with the weapon onshore. Perseus could not find Acrisius and so, his mother relieved, they set back out to sea. Danae assumed that her father had died of age and so did Perseus. They arrived back home and lived a happy life.

Moral

This ending teaches the lesson that even when trying to avoid the inevitable, one’s decisions cause things to happen, one way or another.